Defects in the cerebellum can affect these functions. The most obvious of the cerebellar deficits in the presence of absence epilepsy are the increased risk of developing ataxia, tonic-clonic seizures, and myoclonus. There is evidence that the cerebellum is also involved in the generation and control of normal spike-wave discharges, including absence seizures. Our hypothesis is that the simple spike and complex spike discharges which normally occur during absence seizures are generated and/or modulated by a direct projection from cerebellar to neocortical regions. In addition, the spiking of the thalamic nuclei is also modulated by this projection. To test this hypothesis we will use the recently developed technique of intracellular recording from the cerebellum, combined with microelectrodes or micropipettes to record from neocortical cells. In preliminary studies we have found that in acute slices of rat cerebellum, when complex spikes are blocked by kainate, simple spikes can be maintained in certain portions of the cortex. These are characterized by a short spike duration, and an initial large positive going transient. In addition, they can be interrupted by hyperpolarizing
