And I use the UnhandledErrorAsync from this MSDN example. But as soon as I create the mocked data like this, it fails :
var test = new DataAccess.DataProvider(); var mock = new Mock(); mock.Setup(x => x.Info("Your password must be between 6 and 12 characters")).ThrowAsync("Your password must be between 6 and 12 characters"); test.Logger = mock.Object; This is the error I get : System.NotImplementedException : The requested method isn't implemented by the mocked object. at

FooBar.Data.DataProvider.EnsureValidPassword(String password) at FooBar.Data.DataProvider.GetDatabaseStructureAsync(Boolean fullTableName) A:
In a mocked object there is no implementation for the method. There is only an expectation. For that to work, setup the expectation of the method and not the result of the method call. For example: mock.Setup(x => x.Info("Your password must be between 6 and 12 characters")).ThrowsAsync(new Exception("Some error message")); This would result in a successful TestCase. If you instead want to return false, you have to set up the returned value of the method call: mock.Setup(x => x.Info("Your password must be between 6 and 12 characters")).Returns(false); This would result in a failed TestCase And the last (but IMO not correct) is to set up the result of the method call to something that indicates the violation: mock.Setup(x => x.Info("Your password must be between 6 and 12 characters")).ThrowsAsync(new Exception("ErrorMsg")); Which would result in a failed TestCase
