This study characterizes the corpus luteum of the guinea-pig (Cavia porcellus) in pregnancy. The corpus luteum of the guinea-pig exhibits some characteristics common to that of other laboratory species such as rapid and frequent degradation of the corpus luteum with the death of a cell type, the luteal body, which is inversely related to progesterone production.

Additionally, the corpus luteum of the guinea-pig has some characteristics which seem to be uniquely guinea-pig. Specifically, the acellular stroma and the coalescence of the luteal cells are different from those of the rat, and the formation of the corpus luteum does not depend upon steroid stimulation. The corpus luteum of the guinea-pig in pregnancy is distinguished by the appearance of a specialized cell, the granulosa lutein cell. The granulosa lutein cell can be classified into two types: a small granulosa lutein cell, and a large granulosa lutein cell. The granulosa lutein cell synthesizes a large quantity of progesterone and has a relatively low nucleus/cytoplasm ratio.
