Undernutrition is increasing the burden of post-polio syndrome. We have recently identified and characterized a condition in which post-polio syndrome occurs at a younger age and more severe disability than would be expected in persons who had polio as an adult. We are now defining the population at highest risk for this condition and the risk factors that contribute to it. From all ambulatory persons seen at the Polio Clinic of King County between 1990 and 1999, the numbers of those with definite poliomyelitis, post-polio syndrome, or both were determined, and a review of medical records was conducted. The cumulative disability of patients with post-polio syndrome or both were compared with those of patients with definite poliomyelitis and those with another disabling condition. Between 1990 and 1999, 4,582 persons were seen at our clinic, 2,368 of whom had definite poliomyelitis and 376 had post-polio syndrome. In this patient population, there were 12 cases (0.3%) of post-polio syndrome; for the same time period, 24 cases (0.9%) of definite poliomyelitis occurred. These results indicate that the incidence of post-polio syndrome is increasing, and that the risk of developing this condition increases with increasing age and severity of polio.
