The use of accounting software allows users to track the financial transactions that occur within a business. Users are able to report, review, and/or analyze the financial information that was generated as a result of business operations. Many businesses generate financial transactions using a paper-based system (or “paper trail”).

Financial transactions are typically generated in the form of an account ledger that includes a specific identifier for the transaction. An accountant or bookkeeper may refer to a ledger to report and/or analyze the financial transactions that occurred as a result of business operations. It is also common for an accountant to manually key in, or otherwise manually record the financial transactions that occurred as a result of business operations onto the ledger. Financial transactions are typically entered in the ledger through the use of accounting software. Financial transactions may be manually entered by the accountant, or they may be automatically entered by the accountant. Accounting software typically generates a ledger, which is identified by the bookkeeper as a given date and includes a listing of transactions and financial balances for each account. Bookkeepers may
