A major clean-up of the capital’s orange and green two-wheel transport found that a staggering 45 million particles were released into the air during just one ride. In a report published today, the annual London Air Quality and Health Index (LAQHI) found that pollution levels, due to the number of vehicles and scooters involved, now match those of the most polluted cities in the UK. And a separate analysis found that even one ride contributes to a nuisance “choking feeling” for those looking down on the capital and the Haggerston waste-tip in Hackney, East London. The latest figures were gleaned from just one day in July last year. But the report reveals riders caused a cocktail of pollution, including dust, dust-sized droplets of liquid and bacteria. While when the entire fleet of electric

Image copyright Julian Sabel It's lunchtime in the supermarket and John goes to the deli section where he can buy sandwiches for his picnic. But instead of just eating one, he becomes a sandwich himself. He picks up a pack of cheese, wraps it in bread and sends it to his mouth. He picks up a sausage and wraps it in ham and eggs and sends it down his gullet. He takes a loaf of bread and wraps it in different ingredients, like bacon and chicken and ham and the sea. And he takes a burger, holds it aloft, and prepares for the dance of death. Image copyright Julian Sabel Image caption John sends different combinations of ingredients down his throat In other words, he is making a sandwich. And when he's finished eating it, he takes it home to make a sandwich for someone else. This is John's sandwich, made for his friend, called the Servant. "This is the ultimate sandwich," says John, sitting in the kitchen with five different ingredients wrapped in some kind of bread. John is a food scientist, and this is his latest experiment in the world of Sandwichcraft. John has spent years in the sandwich trade. "I started out as a bagel-maker at a small bakery in New York 3e33713323
