Use KEYMACRO to automate repetitive tasks using key combinations to trigger macros instead of typing in the actual actions. KEYMACRO Categories: - Automation - Macros - Scripts The internet has a lot of information on what a keyboard macro or key macro is, and how to use it. However, I still feel that the actual setup is not explained in enough detail. Therefore, here is an introduction to key macros, or more specifically, key macro for Excel. Key macros are usually used in macros that you run in Microsoft Excel. These macros use a combination of keys on your keyboard. For example, pressing Alt+F6 would open a macro that would make all the text in the active cell bold. By using key macros, you can automate a lot of routine tasks. You can have the same macro run every time you press a certain combination of keys, and then write a code to make that macro do what you want. Key macros and macro programming are more complex than they seem, and I don't want to bore you with a lot of technical details here. I will instead give you a short introduction on what they are, and how to do the programming yourself. The basics of key macros Key macros are just macros, that is, they work just like other macros, but instead of typing in a line of codes, the action is done by pressing certain keys on the keyboard. Like macros in general, the key macros are created in a Macro editor, which is found in Excel's Excel menu. As the macros are created in the macro editor, they will be saved as a macro. When a macro is executed, it will take over control of the Excel program, just like other macros. The macro is triggered by keys that you program in the macro editor. You can use any number of keys, and the program will be triggered whenever you press that combination of keys. The program will run the macro in the same way as it would if you had typed the macro manually in the macro editor, that is, it will open a dialog box where you can choose the range of cells you want to change, and the macro will run until the End Sub statement. Key macros are used in two different ways. One is to run the macro in a defined set of cells, and the other is to run a macro in the active cell. If you want to run the macro in a defined set of cells, you need to define those cells in the macro editor 1d6a3396d6
