Ten years of monitoring of four large ($\geq 1\text{km}^2$) inshore and oceanic coral reefs in the Florida Keys, USA revealed a shift in the structure of the coral reef algae (including the macroalgal community) between 2003 and 2012. The most persistent changes were in the abundance and dominance of the fleshy macroalgae Hithon squamiger, a fish characteristic macroalgae food (less than 1% of the macroalgal biomass) and these changes were consistent across reefs. On each reef, Hithon squamiger most likely benefited from an increase in canopy cover of canopy-forming cyanobacteria. Other macroalgae often excluded by Hithon (e.g. Fucus serratus, Sargassum and Gracilaria species) decreased. The overall green biomass (45 to 77% total macroalgal biomass) declined on all reefs, as did the largest (≥ 10 cm diameter) macroalgal classes (e.g. Fucales and Rhodophyta). New abundant opportunistic species increased, including the invasive Sargassum (Porphyra) yezoensis. Overall, most species showed a decrease in cover on all reefs, especially the coralline algae Prolithon, Bryopsis, Sarcophyton and Favia. Across reefs, changes in the relative importance of the coral reef framework (e.g. live coral
