The present invention relates to a trocar and obturator assembly. More specifically, it pertains to a disposable trocar and obturator assembly for use during laparoscopic surgery. In the past, the field of laparoscopic surgery has advanced greatly, and laparoscopic procedures have been safely and successfully performed for cholecystectomies, sterilizations, ect. Despite the advances of the prior art, however, there still remains a need to provide a trocar and obturator assembly which can be fully disposable, while at the same time offering a design which can be manufactured easily, while maintaining an integrity and strength which will allow it to withstand the rigors of the medical profession. The trocar and obturator assembly of the present invention allows for a disposable assembly which can be easily manufactured, which will maintain a strength and integrity which will allow it to withstand the rigors of the medical profession and is suitable for use with laparoscopic procedures. The assembly of the present invention comprises an outer cannula having a collar for receiving a trocar sleeve. A trocar sleeve is comprised of a trocar handle, an outer cannula, and a stylet. A stylet is housed within the outer cannula. An obturator housing is comprised of a cannula tube, a collar, a trocar handle, and a stylet. The cannula tube defines the distal end of the obturator housing and the trocar sleeve defining the proximal end of the obturator assembly. When the trocar and obturator assembly of the present invention is placed in an outer tube, the stylet is in the cannula tube and the trocar handle is in the trocar sleeve. The stylet, by virtue of its entry at the proximal end of the obturator assembly, locks within the inner cannula, thus locking the two parts together. When the obturator handle is rotated within the trocar sleeve, the stylet is driven out of the inner cannula and into the sclerotic wall of the blood vessel. Subsequently, the trocar sleeve is pushed from the trocar handle and into the blood vessel. The obturator assembly of the present invention is designed such that the stylet is forced out by the trocar handle through the trocar sleeve, and into the tissue that is being cut, thus cutting the tissue with the stylet. Once the cut has been made, the assembly is removed and a new assembly
